

Benefits of Hiring a Water Restoration Company

By Basil Housewright

If your home has suffered from water damage, you will need to move quickly to have your residence fully restored. Most homeowners have homeowners insurance which would assist with the cost of restoration and repairs if the resulting damage is over your policy Clause 2 – All Other Perils Deductible. Even if the damage appears to be an event which you will claim on your insurance do not wait around to get restoration started. The insurance company only pays the costs of the restoration covered over your deductible they do not provide the restoration process for you. The best water damage restoration companies offer complete services that will restore your home to its former condition. Going it alone and trying to repair the damage yourself or worse, ignoring what has happened to your home in the belief that when it dries out everything will be fine may lead to a far worse condition than the original water damage itself.

If the water damage is smaller call the restoration company first and they can typically let you know rather quickly if the total cost of restoration is going to be over your deductible. It is typically not recommended to file an insurance claim if the costs for restoration will be below your deductible.

What is important when this happens is to make sure that the clean-up, repair and restoration gets started and completed as soon as possible following the damage. The major restoration companies are typically experienced at working home insurance claims so they can assist in documenting the necessary damages if an insurance claim needs to be filed and many times will work directly with Insurance Adjusters on your behalf to assist in getting your claim expedited. When time is limited and you are confused about the mess, the best thing to do is to hire a professional water damage restoration contractor within 24 hours of the event. There are many benefits to hiring a licensed contractor over doing the project yourself. Some of them are described below in detail.

Hiring a contractor typically can meet any challenge pertaining to water damage. These professionals usually can do the entire process of cleanup and restoration quickly and without hassles because they carry the necessary equipment to complete the job. Furthermore, they usually employ many workers to get it done quickly and handle several aspects of damage as well.

Restoration professionals should know the techniques to prevent mold and mildew from growing on walls, cabinets, windows, doors, basements and other places where water has made its way. They typically use industrial grade cleaners and safe disinfectants to ensure there is no danger from these elements to you or your family's health in the future. If untreated or handled by you, you will be risking health and property value, so it is always best left to professionals. They should take care of preliminary water damage and make sure secondary water damage in the form of potentially harmful fungi and mold never happens.

Some contractors offer reconstruction help as part of their restoration services or they are in partnership with other professionals to do it. Whenever you hire people to work on your water damage project, take the time to research them. Ask professionals for as many references as possible and get at least three verified. Make sure that they meet your requirements. No one likes to crunch numbers but having a budget is another way to determine the scope of the project. We hope this never happens to you but if it does please take our advice.
